Harriete Kisakye

Harriete Kisakye

HARRIETE Kisakye is the voice behind the love songs Kinigeria, Kandahar and Gyenvudde. She is a single mother with one son. Pidson Kareire had a chat with her

Most of your popular songs are obscene. Do you enjoy obscenities?

(Laughs) No. They are not and I don't enjoy obscenities.

Someone may think you do what you preach.

But we go through this experience. It may be you or your friend; but it happens.

Wasn't your song praising Kandahar obscene?

There is a message I want to pass to on the people; I don't want children to understand it so I use such language. I know fans get the message.

So, who did you take to Kandahar?

Now, this is personal.

Did the Kandahar work as you say in the song?

Exactly - It did.

How did your fans respond to Kandahar?

Eeh! Most male fans expected much from me and they asked for my mobile phone number while others asked to take me out.

Have you put your guy in the bottle as Kinigeria suggests?

Definitely. But he was also willing and interested. We met at a conference and talked, one thing led to the other and when the chemistry worked we agreed to relate, but we have not formalised our marriage.

How do you fit a man in a bottle?

With mutual love and faithfulness, any man will put himself in the bottle.

Men say beautiful women are a problem; what do you say?

I also believe so. Beautiful women have a complex; they are confused and never satisfied. They always think that beauty is the only thing a man looks for in a woman and, in most cases, they use this to disorganise men, if not the whole society.

What about money?

I don't look for money in a relationship because I know that a settled and loved man makes more money. I like a lovely and hardworking man. Money has never bought love. If money is involved that becomes prostitution.

Do you think love has lost meaning today?

To some extent, yes. Most people no longer have genuine love. The world has become deceptive, there is a lot of mistrust and love is being taken for commercial gains and competition; whoever has the money takes the best or the lion's share.

Kisakye put her man in the bottle? I wonder what the man's mother has to say about that. But most of all, I would like to know what Kisakye would say when another woman put her son in a bottle. Because what goes around comes around.

I would rather my man and I were as free as God created us. It feels soooo good every day you wake up and he still loves you, and you him of course. It's like everyday you renew your decisions, to stick together.

Have you put your guy in the bottle as Kinigeria suggests?

Definitely. But he was also willing and interested. We met at a conference and talked, one thing led to the other and when the chemistry worked we agreed to relate, but we have not formalised our marriage.

This was an interesting interview. To recap I've taken out the part where Kisakye has spoken about the issue of placing her beau in a bottle. My take on this is that Kisakye was speaking figuratively and not literally to the method of sustaining her relationship with her man. BTW - I love the natural persona this artist puts forward and perhaps my take on her interview is swayed...The tribute song "Gyenvudde" and the video says it all...

Something which I'd air to agree with you Meli when you state that using chemically enhancing stuff to alter one's state of mind to favour this or that is rather a sad and a desperate action.

For one thing - it highlights lack of self belief or esteem if not confidence, of who one is. What you are left with is a shadow of the real person that existed prior to your tamperings. Plenty more fish in the sea - move on if the person you love don't return the flow and quit wasting energy on altering them.

Because you can't really. If they stay with you, they were meant to. If they weren't, they won't, whatever you do.
